

History

Native Americans have always found ways to communicate with others. For many years it was believed that “Mobile” were a tribe of people when in actuality, it was a trade language. Today in the town of Teotihuacan Mexico, 20 or more different languages can be heard spoken because it invites people from around the world to visit and explore their culture. It is of course no different with communication with animals. Most Native Americans created some type of animal calls and among those were eagle whistles. Some were made from eagle bones, some of them wooden and in Central America many out of clay. This eagle whistle was designed with every advanced ornithological technology while upholding the utmost respect and concern of many of the old Native American beliefs and values. I hope you find them as wonderful and mystifying as we have!

How to use

Start off by holding the whistle with the mouthpiece facing you in your left hand. Partially cover the top of the whistle with your fingers and begin to blow through it by only blowing air and mouthing the Lakota word for blue “TO” (pronounced like “toe”).

While making a long “TO” sound end it by saying the Lakota word for snow “WA” (like in the beginning of the word “water” and end the pronunciation abruptly). While making this sound, let your fingers uncover the holes. You then say it again “TO-WA. TO-WA. TO-WA.” Like any language, you must practice to perfect your skills!

Caution!

These animal calls can produce extremely loud tones. Please direct the sound away from yourself and others and always use ear protection.
